Fabrizio did not reply. It was impossible to read Cristina s thoughts. Did she, or did she not feel this sudden occurrence which, however cautious Doctor Sacchetti might be in his language, might undoubtedly lead to a condition of things that so short a time previously she had qualified as an escape from her-present position? It is a horrible thing, he exclaimed suddenly. I wish to God it had never happened, Cristina! She turned and looked at him penetratingly. Do you really wish that? she asked. Think what--what Ugo s death would mean to you. Perhaps it is destiny, this accident. Who knows? Fabrizio turned quickly away from her. Before God, Cristina, I swear that I had forgotten all that it would mean to me--I never thought of it until this moment; I do not wish to think of it, for I should feel myself like a murderer. Why do you remind me of it--why have you always reminded me of it? I was thinking of the difference it would make to us--to our position. The other is nothing; and I wish that Ugo and I bore different names and had nothing to do with each other. Do you not care, Cristina? do you not care at all that he lies there--so suddenly struck down--and that at any moment some little thing may place his life in danger? I care for you, and for you only, replied Cristina...
