Another differentially wound generator, specially intended for electric are welding work, is made by the Lancashire Dynamo and Motor Company, Limited, of Trafford Park, Manchester. It is shown coupled direct on the same bed-plate to its motor in Fig. 38, while a diagram of the windings of the two machines is given in Fig. 39. As will be observed, the arrangement of the winding is different in several particulars from the windings of the machines which have been described above. There is a shunt winding A which is connected across the armature of the generator, and has a regulator in circuit with it, and a series winding which is in the arc welding circuit, and there is a third separately excited winding B which, however, is arranged in series with the field winding of the motor across the supply mains. In describing the arrangement the makers write as follows: The arc may be struck across the armature of the generator without any resistance in circuit, and the plant is capable of running for short periods with the armature of the generator short circuited. The windings A and B tend to assist one another, while the winding C opposes both, and hence tends to lower the generator voltage. No series resistance is used in the welding circuit. At the moment of touching the work with the electrode there is a tendency for an excessive current to flow in...
