But the court hardly seemCatchpole. ed to notice it a. Peckham now insisted, that, even in the view in which the question was placed by the argument on the other side, if ministerial officers might in these cases at their risque exercise a discretion, the jury, who were the proper judges of the fact of intent and malice, had pronounced that there was here no just cause of detainer. Bul/er, J. This is a question of consequence, and will require some consideration. I think, that, if we were to say that a constable is justifiable in this cafe, we should go the length of saying, that he is to some purposes a judicial officer; which is going farther than has ever yet been adjudged. 6 It would be to allow a constable to examine witnesses, act upon their testimony though he cannot administer an oath, and...
