Excerpt: .And the ship he has with him--it must be the Fingal--she should be detained. I have already sent orders to the marine barracks for a force of marines to board and hold her, replied the Commandant. As he ceased speaking, a marine entered the room. The ship? Has she been detained? inquired his superior. The ship is gone, sir. Gone! you say. Yes, sir. As soon as she finished loading, she hauled out into midstream; they had to take boats to get off to her, and soon as those aboard her saw them coming, they up-anchor and away they went down the river, sir. Words failed the irascible Commandant--he gasped and sputtered. Captain Warrington, cooler-headed and more resourceful, was the first to speak. The telegraph! he cried. The telegraph! Call the operator and have him notify the ships on guard duty at the Capes. The operator is at supper, but I can telegraph, said Graham. Swift as were his movements, those of Captain Romaine were swifter. Seizing a chair, he lifted it high over his head and with a sweeping blow demolished both instruments; another blow, and he had felled the astonished Graham to the floor; then, throwing the chair full at Captain Warrington, he dove through the open window at the side of the house, falling heavily upon his hands and knees upon the ground outside. Rising to his feet, he darted into the underbrush at the back of the house and was...
