Not illustrated. 1912 Excerpt: .simply twice the freight rate, as in Germany, because in that case we should not be in danger of making a rate so low as to divert traffic from the railway to secondary express in those instances where the latter rate might be lower than the railway rate. Protective provisions are made for these conditions, however. Of course, there should not be a low Government rate in a given direction and a higher rate in another; and so the rates should have to be uniform for given weights and distances. The railways do not object to this, apparently, in the case of the express companies, whose rates are practically the same for differing directions throughout the country. To protect the railway from diversion of its traffic to the express in those instances where its rates may be higher than those of the Government it is proposed...
